Statement By Dan Patrick On His Support For Ted Cruz

Dan Patrick, Texas State Senator and authentic conservative candidate for Lieutenant Governor, issued the following statement regarding his comments recently published about his support for Senator Ted Cruz:

“My opponents have criticized my statement published in the Texas Tribune recently where I said that I would support Senator Cruz if he were to be a candidate for President.

“It is true that I did not support candidate Cruz during the Primary elections – but then again neither any of my opponents. I supported Ted in the General Election, as did all good Republicans. “Since taking office Senator Cruz has impressed me, over and over. I have been quick to give him credit where credit is due. I appreciate Ted for his willingness to take strong stands in Washington. He is providing critical leadership for other conservatives. He is the prescription for what is ailing the country and our Party.

“Two of my opponents, Commissioner Staples and Commissioner Patterson are quick to call me a flip-flopper. “Unlike Mr. Staples and Mr. Patterson, I am not afraid to say I would support Ted Cruz if he were to be a candidate for President. Neither of them seem convinced that he is the right candidate or have yet mustered that courage to say so. “I choose not to act like a politician, never admitting a mistake. It is amazing to me that my opponents do not recognize or will not admit what an outstanding job Ted Cruz is doing in Washington, pressing the battle for conservative ideas. “Who are Mr. Staples and Mr. Patterson supporting for President in 2016 – Chris Christie?”

Hitting Your Muscles From Different Angles

Attack the Angles

One little twist of your wrist and you can drastically change the results in an exercise. Or the slight tilt of a bench. Angles matter, more than most people realize. It doesn't take much of a change in an angle to change the effect on the muscles. Some angle changes even shift the work load to entirely different muscle groups.

One example of a change in angle - instead of the traditional 45 degree angle employed for incline bench press, lower the angle down to 20 to 30 degrees. By lowering the angle of the bench, you will target the upper chest area better. The standard 45 degree incline pulls in a lot of work from the front deltoid muscles - and that is fine if that is your target. However, if you are trying to work the upper chest, a lower angle does a much better job. Try it the next time you perform the incline bench and watch how well it fires up your upper chest region.

The front dumbbell lateral raise works the front delts. By turning your wrist up into a hammer position, you can work both the front and side delts at the same time. A simple twist of the wrist and you have a new exercise. If you have never performed your lateral raises with your wrists in the hammer position, give it a try. And don't stop there - you can turn your wrist even further outward at the top, putting even more emphasis on the side deltoid.

You don't have to use a fixed position when you work the angles. Arnold, for instance, would employ a palms in position when performing the dumbbell press, and by the time the weight was all the way up, his palms would be facing outward. In other words, he rotated his wrists as the weights were pushed upward, and with this shifting angle, worked all the shoulder muscles instead of just the front delts.

Angles can also be used on the lower body as well. You can keep tension on the muscle in the standing leg curl by leaning forward slightly. Virtually any exercise you can do can be altered by the angles you employ. Experimenting is key here as it can lead you to exercise variations that are effective - some more so than others. But the only way you will discover something new and productive is to work with various angles instead of just one.

Daily Aerobic Activity is a Must

Regular aerobic activity should be included into everyone's daily routine to strengthen the heart and lungs and make them work more efficiently. Aerobic activity can include running, walking, stair climbing, dancing, swimming, or any number of other activities that get the heart working harder for a continuous period of time. Many people may feel that they need to have a regimented work out program, and if they do not have at least thirty minutes to an hour to devote that they can't do it. This is simply not true, and in fact, this type of mentality hinders their progress and keeps them from getting into shape with regular exercise. Short bursts of aerobic activity can be fit in throughout the day. Take the stairs instead of the elevator, take a brisk walk around the building at lunch time, ride a bike or walk to work if within a reasonable distance, or park further away to get a short walk in.

The benefits of aerobic activity are many, and everyone of all ages should be encouraged to engage in regular exercise. Even if there are chronic health conditions present, regular aerobic activity can be tailored to fit the individual's needs. A health care provider should be consulted before beginning any type of exercise program, and if excessive shortness of breath or chest pain is present, then the activity should be stopped immediately. Starting out at a slower pace is recommended for all beginners anyway until some tolerance is built up, which will happen over time with regular aerobic activity.

Regular aerobic activity should put the heart in the cardio target zone, which is computed by subtracting age from 220. This number is then multiplied by 85%, the result being the maximum rate at which the heart should be beating during aerobic activity. Beginners should only work out at 70-75% their target heart rate until their bodies become more accustomed to higher aerobic activity levels. It's good to start out slow and gradually increase aerobic activity as tolerated, maybe with just a walk around the block. Any amount of aerobic activity is better than nothing, so get moving! No excuses!
